

I am retired and do a lot of traveling. XM radio allows me to listen to sporting events, such as NASCAR racing, without having to change stations, especially when traveling through mountains where a station is only available a short period of time. My drive is safer, since I'm not always looking for another station. The weather station keeps me up to date, especially now with the stormy conditions in the midwest, where I will be heading. The traffic channels are excellent, especially when you don't live in that city and don't know your way around. Since the FCC has put a gag on most adult radio, there is mostly brainless drivel left on the FM & AM stations. I feel that the FCC would better serve their purpose if they supported satellite radio such as XM radio, instead of caving in to big business. What ever happened to "for the people"?

It all seems to be "for the money". I have 2 satellite radio's, one in my car and one in my home, and they are better than anything else coming over the airways. If you feel you have to exert your government muscle, go after the cell phones being used while driving down the road.
